(The Colin Powell School for Civic and Global Leadership, formerly the Division of Social Science)

Associate Professor Maritsa Poros, Chair • Department Office: NA 6/125 • Tel: 212-650-5485

General Information

The City College offers the following undergraduate degree in Sociology:

Programs and Objectives

Sociology majors may choose to take a varied selection of courses or they may take advantage of the Department's concentration.

In the past the Department's majors have gone on to leadership positions in academic life; city, state, and local government; advertising; consulting; and a number of other related professions.

The Social Research Laboratory

The Social Research Laboratory is used by the Department of Sociology to place students in projects providing pre-professional experience in social welfare agencies. SRL courses (SOC 23300, SOC 23400, SOC 23500, and SOC 23600) may be taken by any student. The student need not be concentrating in Social Work or majoring in Sociology. Students may take the above courses for either two or three credits. The maximum number of credits allowed in these courses (commonly referred to as "fieldwork courses") is six in any one department of the College. The department is currently not offering these courses.

Master's Courses for Undergraduate Students

Some graduate courses may be taken by exceptional juniors and seniors with the permission of the instructor. Students are strongly advised to get the permission of the instructor in writing well before registration. The authorization will be required at registration. The M.A. Program is currently not accepting new students.

Advisement

Prof. Gwendolyn Dordick is the Department advisor for major requirements and other academic issues. Contact her by email at gdordicksociologyadvisor@gmail.com

Students wishing advisement on the graduate program in Sociology should see the director of the MA program. The M.A. Program is currently not accepting new students.

Urban Politics and Policy

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course examines the changing U.S. city with a focus on New York City. Beginning with an overview of U.S. urban politics and policy, we explore the impact of economic, political, demographic and social trends on our cities; then examine several contested policy issues-housing, economic development, education and/or welfare. How and why have national problems become identified as "urban" problems? Is the city a viable problem-solving unit? What are the respective roles of public and private sectors? We will address these questions through critical reading, discussion and writing.

Brown Lives Matters: The Long History of Police Violence against

Latino/a/x People

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course examines three main social processes in the history of oppression and violence as well as resistance Latino/a/x People in the US: namely, (1) how national and local organizations -such as the immigration apparatus, law enforcement agencies, the criminal justice system, and the Media – have historically criminalized Latino/a/x communities; (2) how processes of racialization - and the conflation of structural and cultural characteristics to specific groups – have been historically used to manufacture recognizable social forms of identities to justify the criminalization, detention, killing, search, surveillance, and sterilization of brown and black bodies; and (3) the ways in which Latino/a/x communities have organized to contest these practices and ideologies. To examine these historical dynamics, this course review theories of policing, power, oppression and resistance case studies, and peer review articles.

Housing and Homelessness
Department(s)
Sociology
Description
Housing is more than bricks and mortar. The places we live provide us - to a greater or lesser extent - personal security and comfort, a social environment, and the basis for strong feelings of identity and belonging. This course will examine the material, social and cultural aspects of place, shelter, and home in American society. A focus on the homeless will help bring to the foreground important and often taken-for-granted aspects of place, shelter, and home that are true across the socioeconomic spectrum.

Ethnicity and the State in Africa

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

The course will explore ways in which African states address issues of ethnicity and ethnic nationalism in their respective societies. (Conceptions and forms of ethnicity e.g., ethnic group, ethnically or ethnic community, ethnic nationalism - will be explored.)

All African countries are multi-ethnic or have its functional equivalent. The course will explore various forms of state (unitary, decentralized, federal, con-federal) and analyze how each form of state addresses issues of multi-ethnicity. The different experiences of selected countries will be compared and evaluated. Students will do research and make class presentations on a topic they will select from an approved list of research topics / case studies, and will make class presentations on their research findings. The research paper requires proper documentation and bibliographic information, using the ASA or Chicago style guide

Latino Youths in Schools: Barriers & Breakthroughs

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

Latino students now comprise one out of every four public school students. As this group becomes an increasingly larger proportion of the US student population, understanding their position in the educational system and responding to their unique needs is not only important for other Latinos, but for the nation as a whole. This course is therefore designed for undergraduate students who are interested in doing direct practice or research with diverse populations, particularly Latinos in urban school contexts. Using perspectives from the Sociology of Education, History of Education, and Urban Education, we will explore how immigration status, assimilation and acculturation, language, gender, race/phenotype, and socio-economic background, all influence the experience of Latinos in the US school system.

Blancas, Negras Y Morenas: Race in Another America

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course explores the historical and contemporary factors that affect the construction and of an ethnic or racial identity among Latin American immigrants and their youth in the US. Drawing on history, sociology and literary fiction on the social construction of race and ethnic identities, students learn about the challenges of living in a host society which uses a very different racial schema than those used in the nation of origin. Questions and themes guiding this course include: why are race, ethnicity and gender important categories in the construction of a minority or majority identity? Why are skin color and phenotype so important predictors of social mobility in Latin America and the US? What is the role of the government or that of the Census in the construction, erosion or diffusion of racial identities and boundaries? How may the history of Latin America imperialism, colonization, mestizaje, indigenismo, and modernization help us better capture the social construction of race and its key role in determining majority and minority relations and intergenerational inequality.

Racialization: Single Mothers, Sexual and Religious Minorities

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course offers an introduction to the study of minority and majority group relations in the United States with a comparative focus drawing from examples in Latin America and Europe. We examine the historical factors that have led to the creation of a white majority and a black minority in America and other national contexts; how a minority or majority status is created and internalized by individuals and their youth. We pay close attention to how increasing economic and wealth inequality, globalization and immigration affects the formation of new, minority groups and statuses drawing on the example of growing share of working poor or 'missing class' individuals in America; the life chances of the undocumented, and those of single migrant mothers, religious minorities such as Muslim youth and the networks of sexual minorities that help them integrate in society and cope with glaring discrimination and exclusion. Students will be able to engage in informed debates about how increases in family, ethnic, racial and sexual diversity in the US and other nations will help close the historical divides between white and black groups in America. They will also master new knowledge on how race and racialization processes take place in Latin America or in nations such as Brazil and the Dominican Republic where efforts have been made to alleviate racial inequality and tensions, but where blacks and mulattoes have historically make up the majority of the poor and whites and light-skin people still make up the ruling elite.

Social Psychology Racism Prejudice

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

Migration Disrupts familiar rules of living and leads to conflicts of culture. This course will review developmental psychology theory and discuss psychological disruptions experienced by immigrants in relation to their individual developmental stages. We also will examine disruptions specific to particular ethnic groups. The course will discuss the psychological vulnerabilities as well as resiliencies that result from the process of immigrant acculturation. Throughout the course we will seek to discern preventive measures that could lessen negative outcomes and promote positive outcomes through effective decision making in response to disruptions of migration.

NORMAL ACCIDENTS: SOCIOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES ON MODERN DISASTER

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

In today's world, the wide spread diffusion of high risk technologies interact with weak regulation, institutional corruption, psycho-social dynamics and chance events to render catastrophic accidents normal. Through case studies of disasters and readings in organizational behavior, this course explores the sociological elements underlying human-made catastrophes. Case studies will include airplane and maritime disasters, nuclear power plant accidents, contamination of water and food supplies.

Immigration and the Second Generation

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

The second generation, native-born of foreign parentage, is often caught between two distinctive worlds of their immigrant parents and American society. The study of the second generation is a cutting-edge topic in the fields of immigration and ethnic and racial studies as they are making the transition from school to work. The course examines the ways in which children of immigrants are integrating into different US institutions, such as education, economy, politics, as well as American culture. A key concern is to examine existing theories of assimilation in terms of the similarities and differences between the old (turn of the 20th century) and new (post-1965) second generation. Another important issue is whether the children of immigrants are doing better than their parents educationally and occupationally, given the structural changes in American economy and society. In light of the current political debate about immigration policy, which directly affects the children of undocumented immigrants, the course will also cover this often overlooked group. Although the course will deal with the United States as a whole, the experience of children of immigrants who have grown up in New York will also be highlighted.

Migration, Gender and Health in Latinx Communities

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

Through an interdisciplinary feminist approach, this course explores how women, men, and youth experience health problems related to migration and social inequality. We will place health risks within a transnational context, examining the socio-economic, political, and cultural influences on particular social problems and health outcomes and critique the political discourse on health and how they construct racialized, sexualized others. We examine health promotion and other programs that aim to design culturally sensitive interventions about health problems by migrants and how communities and individuals work toward alleviating their own health risks. Some familiarity with Spanish is helpful.

Journalism and Society: Covering Power

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course is part of the NBCU Academy Fellows Program.

Journalism is often called the fourth estate, which describes the media's role as a watchdog of power, both public and private. The goal of this course is to help students understand how the government works and how to report effectively on the powerful industries, agencies, institutions and individuals that shape our lives. Students will learn the mechanics behind producing fresh stories about politics, the economy, race, education, criminal justice, housing and other pressing issues. They will examine the most important industries and employers -- including the media itself -- the role of small businesses and entrepreneurs, and the impact of economic development and gentrification. Students will explore and learn how to analyze data to uncover insights, trends and narratives buried in the numbers

Sustainability, Diversity & Inclusion: Visions, Realities & Praxes for an Enduring & Just Soc World

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

Immersing ourselves in New York's rich urban ecology with on-site visits, we address the social movements of "sustainability" and "inclusion" with a focus on their respective claims regarding "(bio)diversity" as essential to a healthy planet and a modern equitable society. We explore these claims in the context of our contemporary geopolitics and political economy where difference is, to the contrary, often characterized by inequality. At this impasse of social vision and social reality, we examine the complex relationship between the appropriation and destruction of the material world; the changing ideas and increasing stratification in the social world; and, the contemporary systems of production that appropriate life and consciousness in the global information economy of late high modernity.

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

What is social justice? What does social justice (and injustice) mean in the context of a diverse, global city like New York? We will address these questions by examining how our ideas about justice and injustice measure up against the everyday experiences of people from different social groups in urban contexts from the U.S. and around the world. The course will provide a survey of classic and contemporary ethnographies of urban life (qualitative case studies relying primarily on observation), with an emphasis on relationships of power, privilege, and inequality, and a special focus on Latinx communities and the immigrant experience.?

Data Justice & Algorithmic Accountability

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

Social life is increasingly datafied and governed by algorithms ? that determine what ads and content we see, what opportunities we are given, and how resources are allocated. While regulations and advocacy groups attempt to reign in unethical and questionable practices, many data and algorithmic systems we encounter everyday remain hidden and unaccountable. This course centers on three questions: (1) How do data and algorithm systems work?, (2) What harms do these create?, (3) Should we attempt to fix these, and how?

Peoples of New York City: Sociological Perspectives on the Development of the City

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course will examine the development of the city of New York from the Lenape peoples to the present day with a specific emphasis on race, class, and gender. The course will examine and analyze the systems and structures that have shaped New York City, while seeking to understand how social groups have pursued change inside and outside of such structures. We will utilize New York City as a primary source and conduct field trips to locations discussed throughout the course-- these field trips may take place during class time or on student's own time.

Gender, Race, & Latinidad

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

How is Latinidad defined and what are its implications?

Emphasizing ethnographic approaches, but also drawing on a variety of interdisciplinary sources we examine how racial formations, gender and national belonging have historically and in recent times intersected in the production and representation of Latinidad. More specifically, we will examine how people summon the concept of Latinidad in order to form a unifying collective identity as a political strategy, but also how such projects have the potential to erase other forms of identification or kinds of experiences. Through a close reading of scholarly and popular texts we will engage with themes including transnationalism and migration, social inequality and practices of resistance, gender and sexuality, language, belonging and media representation.

Legacies of Inequalities: Understanding Divergent Socioeconomic Developments in the Americas

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

Why have some countries in the Americas struggled economically while others have thrived? What has been the impact of European colonization, the decimation of the aboriginal populations, and the arrival of millions of enslaved African Black people? This socio-historical survey course contrasts the differential socioeconomic developments of Latin America, the Caribbean, and the U.S. using writings from Dominican sociologist Pedro Francisco Bonó, Peruvian economist José Carlos Mariátegui, Cuban humanist José Martí, Puerto Rican humanist Luis Llorens Torres, Argentinian economist Raul Prebisch, U.S. sociologist Immanuel Wallerstein, and other scholars. In addition, we delve into the influences of foundational, widely translated texts such as Black Skin, White Masks by Martinican psychologist Franz Fanon, Pedagogy of the Oppressed by Brazilian philosopher Paulo Freire, and Open Veins of Latin America by Uruguayan journalist Eduardo Galeano.

Between El Barrio and the Academic: The Struggle for the Academic Space

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

Between El Barrio and the Academic: The Struggle for the Academic Space examines how public education has been historically used to assimilate Latin American diasporas to mainstream America culture, and how, in response, educators from different intellectual traditions have resisted these neocolonial and homogenizing impulses. To chronicle the class between assimilationist and anti-assimilationist forces, Between El Barrio and the Academic reviews the passing of critical legislation such as the Arizona's 2010 Ban on Ethnic Studies (HB 2281), as well as the work of Chican@ and Mexican American activists, Latinx intellectuals, and postcolonial educators and artists.

Digital Sociology

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course will explore sociological concepts from the perspective of our digital society. It will question how digital technology shapes our sense of self and our social relations in, for instance, social media, pop culture and access to modern conveniences. It will also examine the role of digital media in the creation and reproduction of social institutions, social structures, and inequalities. The course will consider the role of digital technologies in surveillance, privacy, and the embodiment of the self in society.

Urban Ethnography

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course will give students the opportunity to study New York's physical, cultural and social landscapes ethnographically.

Ethnographic approaches explore people's everyday lives, behaviors and actions in their natural environments. Students will learn to use the tools of ethnographic methods. The course will explore the cultural importance and meanings attached to urban landscapes, as well as how society's norms and values are quite literally built into parks, sidewalks, indoor and outdoor marketplaces, cafés -- the list is endless.

Interviewing

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This practicum introduces students to accepted interviewing techniques with individuals and groups using both structured and unstructured questionnaires, reviews current federal regulations concerning the protection of human subjects and their informed consent, provides observations of good interviewing and recording techniques, and examines the theory and practice of focus groups. The use of translation and translators and other practical cultural and ethical issues are discussed. Students gain an understanding of the function of interviews conducted in the social sciences and in a variety of professional settings including social work, human resources, health and human services and journalism. Training and supervision in structured interviews with volunteer research subjects will be provided. Advanced students may conduct supervised focus groups

Juvenile Justice

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course looks at the historical origins and contemporary state of juvenile justice in America; it takes a systems approach to address various institutions (e.g. police, juvenile court, probation) involved in the juvenile justice process. Topics include creation/evolution of the juvenile court, the changing notions of adolescence and youth, and issues such as risk assessments, diversion programs, fines and fees, and alternatives to incarceration. The course goal is to illustrate the complex web of individual, cultural and social factors underlying the causes of and judicial responses to juvenile delinquency.

Sociology of Mental Health

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course investigates the complex social and cultural processes that shape our experiences and meanings of mental health. The course will begin by outlining a sociological approach to mental health distinguished from psychological and biomedical models. Special attention will be paid to how experiences of mental health intersect with axes of race, class, gender, and sexuality, and to understanding the psychological traces of histories of colonialism, slavery, war, and migration. Students will use the course's methodologies and theories to trouble normative concepts of health and wellness in order to arrive at alternative definitions of health and healing. The course is interdisciplinary in scope and will draw on frameworks of mental health from diverse fields including medical sociology, affect theory, critical race theory, feminist and queer theory, and disability studies to explore the entanglements between our psychic lives and social words.

Science, Technology, and Society

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

Some people may assume science is a natural phenomena that can be observed without bias. However, science is actually a product of social relations, and it can create, reinforce, and exacerbate social inequalities. This course examines the interconnections between science, technology, and society, and how social values are embedded and encoded in the tools and knowledge scientists use and produce, with implications for everyday lives and communities. We examine examples of knowledge production and its impacts on society in advances in neuroscience, environmental science, genomics, aerospace engineering, stem cell research, and more.

Sexuality, Gender, and Disability

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course applies a critical lens to the study of sexuality, gender, and disability. We examine how social oppression is experienced by persons whose physical, cognitive, or psychological characteristics fall outside of socially constructed norms. In particular, we investigate the complex historical influences that impact how people discuss sexuality and disability. For example, people with disabilities have been considered asexual, hypersexual, or as victims, all of which deny their agency as sexual beings. We use disability, feminist, critical sexuality, and queer theories to explore and question various issues effecting the sexual lives and experiences of persons with disabilities and how these might help us understand gender and sexuality more generally. To understand the intersection of sexuality and disability, we engage with scholarly readings, news articles, popular media, social media, and TV shows/movies.

Sociology & Queer of Color Critique

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

Why are mainstream LGBTQ+ studies and queer theories so white-centered, while theorizations of race and ethnicity pose heterosexuality as the norm? Using the interdisciplinary framework of Queer of Color Critique, we explore how to expand and challenge the heterosexual and white-centered assumptions of sociology of sexualities, gender, and race through the perspectives and experiences of LGBTQ+ people of color. To examine how such social constructions of sexualities and gender intersect with race, ethnicity, class, ability, and other social identity categories, we examine macro level issues of colonialism, imperialism, immigration and migration, mass incarceration and policing as they pertain to racial and sexual/gender minorities. We will also cover immediate and ongoing issues, such as transphobia, drag queen phobia, activism/social movements, media representation, homelessness, and book banning that impact the everyday experiences of LGBTQ+ people, especially queer youth.

Immigration Narratives: Interconnected stories of our pasts, ourselves and future generations

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

What are our stories, and what can we share with future generations? In this course, students will explore and critique federal, state, and local policies, ranging from DACA to everyday paperwork, that impact immigration and migrant experiences in the United States. Students will conduct interview-based research about the migration-related experiences and histories of their families, friends, community members, and others. In undertaking this research, students will understand how individual histories and biographies intersect with longstanding, systemic inequalities. Students will learn about major events in the history of migration to the US, how to design and carry out qualitative research projects, and explore creative ways of sharing these with wider audience. Students' work will contribute towards an open-access textbook on the Sociology of Immigration that will be taught in future classes.

Medical Professions, Authority, and Activism

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

With the rise of digital health technologies, the wellness industry, and alternative medicines, medical systems now contend with challenges to physician authority. This course examines transformations in the physician-patient relationship in the U.S. and globally, and increased coordination with other health professionals and stakeholders, such as nurses, EMTs, minoritized populations, and patient activists, in the social organization of medicine.

Future of Work: Getting a Job in the New Economy

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

The future of work is changing as a result of rapid technological change, shifting global product and labor markets, evolving regulatory regimes, outsourcing, and the emergence of the gig economy. This course focuses on jobs in new industries which are knowledge-, technology-, and service-based rather than manufacturing-based. These jobs require human, social, and cultural capital, work arrangements that are precarious and flexible rather than stable and fixed, and increasing global connectivity, investment, and immigration. The course will consider a broad range of industries and jobs (IT, service, culture, manufacturing) that are relevant to the next generations of workers.

Race, Health, and the Politics of the Body

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

The body is central to theorizations of race and racism. This course will explore how bodies are produced, managed, and mobilized with a particular focus on the intersections between race, health, science, and medicine. We will examine how race and bodily difference are constructed through discourses and practices of health as well as how they are embodied and mobilized for social change. Topics of concern include but are not limited to: histories of scientific racism and eugenics, health inequalities, discourses of social pathology, cultural representations of the racialized body, and embodied knowledge/politics. This course is intentionally interdisciplinary in scope and will approach race, health, and the body from diverse fields including medical sociology, science and technology studies, critical race theory, feminist and queer theory, and disability studies.

Feminist Thought

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course aims to understand and theorize the nature of gender inequality. It introduces students to a variety of frameworks (both classical and contemporary) for understanding sex, gender, sexuality, power, and oppression within sociology and in interdisciplinary perspective. Through case studies, students will learn to apply different feminist concepts and theoretical approaches to everyday life

Education and Social Development

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

Education is commonly viewed as a necessary condition for social development. Social development refers to improving the well-being of individuals in a society to advance the common good. This course will compare educational and social development across countries, emphasizing how each impacts the other. It will examine why education is considered a necessary though not sufficient condition for social development. It will also consider how social development can influence opportunities for formal education in many societies. The course will consider theoretical, methodological and empirical aspects of social stratification studies in the fields of education and social development. ?

Health Inequalities in Global Context

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course will examine the long-term patterns and processes underlying global health disparities within and between countries with respect to health care access and the political and health consequences embedded in these inequalities. Specifically, the course will study the political, economic and institutional relationships within and between countries that shape health care access and how these relationships affect the susceptibility of citizens in disparate nations to chronic and acute health conditions. We will also examine how these structural relationships are likely to create the conditions for the emergence of catastrophic pandemics involving either new or mutated pathogens

Central American Migration: Displacement, Transit, Borders, and Refuge

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course introduces students to Central American migration from the 1950s to the present. It aims to provide a general framework for understanding the conditions of displacement, transit, and the migratory experiences of Central American migrants and refugees. Central American experiences of mobility will be explored through different theoretical perspectives, case studies, and human rights reports, among other sources of knowledge.

Role of Activism and Voluntary Nonprofits

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course introduces the sociological study of how the practices and forms of nonprofit organizations and voluntary associations shape activism and vice versa. These forms of collective action coordinate activities towards advancing particular causes, enacting public policy, such as providing services, or enhancing fellowship amongst members. This course also prepares students to undertake research and critical analyses of such collective action, with the aim of helping students apply theoretical concepts about organizing practices and institutional environments to groups or organizations.

Environment, Society, Sustainability in Latin America

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course focuses on the changing relationship between social systems and the environment and contemporary challenges to sustainability in developing countries. Grounded in the interdisciplinary study of the relationships between nature and society, the course draws on fundamental concepts and theories from sociology and allied social sciences, as well as interdisciplinary research in the areas of environmental justice, gender studies, development studies, environmental history, and action-based research. Using a place-based understanding of development and sustainability in Asia, sub-Saharan Africa, and Latin America, the course evaluates different possibilities for improving livelihoods and promoting more just and sustainable societies. Topics include access to land and natural resources; ethno-ecological practices, traditional knowledge and local food production; urbanization, power and environmental politics; modernization and resource depletion; environmental racism and social justice; climate change and social movements; social institutions and resource governance; and global efforts to promote conservation of biodiversity.?

Artificial Intelligence AI and Society: The Social Impacts of Artificial Intelligence

Department(s)

Sociology

Description

This course explores the social impacts of Artificial Intelligence (AI). AI involves the development of intelligent computer systems capable of tasks typically requiring human intelligence. The course examines how AI is transforming society by automating tasks, optimizing processes, and extracting insights from data as well as ethical considerations such as bias, privacy, security, and job displacement. Students will delve into the social implications of AI in labor markets, social media, the arts, education, government, etc. We will critically examine the cultural, economic, and social impacts of AI, considering topics like ethics, power dynamics, automation, and the future of work.
